Just about everybody in the world knows that this is 99.99% a political problem and not a technical one. Continuing studies and evaluations to further strengthen the technical considerations, for another 25 or 50 years, will not make its acceptance any easier.

Therefore, one should either gain political acceptance and get started on the real work or put the whole program on hold until the politicians finally decide to make a decision. At least the latter approach would save valuable dollars and it would be even more obvious where the real roadblocks lie.

Thank you for the opportunity to comment.
